Abstract

The pandemic of COVID-19 has destabilized the world order to a certain extent both in theoretical and structural terms with various international agencies, supranational organizations and most importantly, the nation-states failing to grasp the root of the problem and how to give a strong rejoinder to the enigma. This has forced states to adopt various dimension of particularistic response to tackle the problem within its defined boundaries through various measures ranging from socio-economic, cultural and political means. The pandemic has also nudged the intellectual mind to think about the fault lines that exists between the established theoretical considerations which may have implications for the population of the world having a mobile atypical life pattern outside the cordon of the nation-state. The purpose of this paper is to understand and delve into the theoretical territory of nation, state, nation-state and nationalism and how the concepts and their practical existence being different poses an existential challenge to the survival of the refugees especially the Rohingyas. The pandemic exacerbates the process of stress between the concept of the nation and the state. The methodological aspect of this enquiry deals with the
